DEFINITION

Multiple Sclerosis (MS) is a chronic disease that affects the central nervous system (CNS: brain and spinal cord). It causes inflammation and the destruction of myelin. This “demyelination” process interferes with nerve impulse transmission, affects muscular control, and causes a variety of sensory, motor, and psychological symptoms. Damage to the myelin usually resolves with time and symptoms subside, but repeated attacks can lead to a continual process of demyelination and remyelination, which produces nerve fiber scarring and progressive disability.

GENERAL SYMPTOMS OF THE DISEASES:

Because MS can attack any area of the CNS, the signs and symptoms of MS are many and varied. They are associated with what the nerves in the affected area(s) are responsible for controlling.

Sensory symptoms may include numbness, tingling, pain, burning, itching, facial pain, and visual disturbances. Motor symptoms may include speech impediments, weakness, tremor, difficulty walking, lack of coordination, constipation, and problems with the control of urination. Psychological symptoms may include mood swings, depression, and cognitive impairment. Fatigue occurs in up to 90% of patients, and about 60% are temperature-sensitive; their symptoms temporarily worsen with heat.

The symptoms of MS may come and go, and their duration may last from days to months. Complete or partial remission of symptoms, especially in the early stages of the disease, occurs in approximately 70 percent of patients.
