GENERAL SYMPTOMS OF THE DISEASE

Atherosclerosis is a disease, which causes the arteries becoming narrowed.

The condition can affect arteries in any area of the body and is a major cause of stroke, heart attack, and poor circulation in the legs.

The arteries become narrowed when fatty substances, like cholesterol, that are carried in the blood get collected on the inside lining of the arteries.

In addition, the muscle layer of the artery wall becomes thickened, narrowing the artery even more. Platelets can accumulate in clumps on the surface of the deposits and initiate the formation of blood clots. A large clot might then completely block the artery and which results in an organ being deprived of oxygen.

The female sex hormone estrogen helps protect against the development of atherosclerosis, as a result the incidence of atherosclerosis is much lower in women before menopause than in men. By age 60, the risk of women who take hormone replacement therapy, that contains estrogen, can continue to be protected.
