DEFINITION

Piles are swellings on the inside of the anal canal, the short, muscular tube that connects the rectum (back passage) with the anus, in areas known as the anal cushions. They are round swellings that can reach the size of a grape. Piles are not varicose veins. Although piles develop from inside the anal canal, they can hang down out of their normal place. First-degree piles are swellings on the inside lining of the anal canal. Second-degree piles are larger and stick out. Third degree piles are similar, but hang out from the anus and only return inside when pushed back in. Fourth degree piles permanently hang down from the anus. They may become extremely swollen and painful if the blood in them clots.
